

Found Music

JEFFERY A. TRIGGS

Copyright ©2001 by Jeffery A. Triggs. All rights reserved.

FOR SARA

Contents

I	Archeology of Feeling	1
	L'envoi	3
	Archeology of Feeling	4
	Intermission	5
	Kinderszenen	7
	Midlife Mirrors	9
	Cleaning Up For Charlotte Elena	11
	Sandbox, Soldiers	12
	Eight For Jeffery David	13
	Pinewood Derby for Jeffery David, and Jeffery, and David	15
	The Last Spring of the Millennium For Jeffery David	17
	Watching for Snow for Charlotte Elena, Age 16, January 2, 1999	19
	Aspiring to the Condition of Espresso	21
	Central Park, Sunday for Sara	23
	Traveling from Virginia by Train	24
	Morning	25
	Kampf For Professor Edward Glas	26
	Magnolias 2000	28
	Nature	29
	The Wolf at the Door a Dream	30
	Morning	31
	Christmas Morning 1999	32
	Marblehead—August 1984	33
	Twenty Years to Life for Sara, May 17, 2000	34
II	Detail of the Last Judgment	36
	Deathmask of a Girl Drowned in Paris—1895	38

Edvard Munch—The Shriek 1910	38
Paul Delaroche—The Execution of Lady Jane Grey for Charlotte Elena	41
Death on the Battlefield: Photograph from the Spanish Civil War	43
Attic Stele on a Child's Tomb	44
The Lacemaker Ca 1666	45
John Brett—The Stonebreaker—1857-58	47
Hughes—April Love—1855-56	49
Gainsborough—Giovanna Baccelli—1782	51
Sargent—Carnation, Lily, Lily, Rose—1885-86	53
Horse Dying at his Cart—Andre Kertesz	55
Paris Boulevard by Daguerre—1839	57
Young Lady Aged 21, Possibly Helena Snakenborg—1569	59

III Life Masks 61

L'envoi	63
Aubade	64
Hamlet knew it, when Shakespeare	65
Marvelous to drink the riddle of October	66
First Cup of Coffee, a daydream for S	67
Antiques	68
A Small Secular Song	69
Lear's Wife	70
Young Woman Combing Her Hair	71
The cat in the window is very lazy of the sunlight	72
Like a fig, or maybe like the universe	73
For Sara	74
Apples—for Sara	75
Grunts	76

IV Commuting 77

Bird House at the Bronx Zoo—for the Zanders	79
Tigers of the Moscow Circus	80
The Peacock	81
Undertow—Bethany Beach, Delaware	82
Home Run	83
Verzweiflung	85

Inside my mind a mild-mannered madman	86
Birdsong I	87
Nesting	88
At the Sea Shore—for my father	89
Portrait of the Author as a Child—for my father	90
Commuting to Montclair	91

V Found Music	92
L'envoi	94
Dandelions	95
A Snail in Abersoch	96
Lines for Gregory	97
Three Old Women	98
Rose of Sharon	99
For Charlotte Elena, Three Weeks and One Day	100
Scene from Swan Lake—for Charlotte Elena	101
To Charlotte Elena, Dancing	102
Rilke's Carousel, Jardin du Luxembourg	103
Children's Voices, Jardin du Luxembourg	104
Cleanup	105
For Charlotte Elena	106
For Sara	107
Bellcore Geese for Sara	108
A Room for Charlotte Katcher	109
For Jeffery David	110
For Jeffery David, Age Three Weeks and One Day	111
Learning About Gravity—for Jeffery David	113
Ungeheure for my father	114
December	116
For Charlotte Elena, Age 10, January 2, 1993	117
Found Music	118
Glory	119
A Letter to Michael (1954—1962)	120
“Real” Love—for Sara	122

Part I

Archeology of Feeling

L'envoi

Hands connected at the tips, held out as if in beggarliness. What will come?
An airplane soars above, destination Heathrow, perhaps. On the ground it does not matter.

What will come? Eyes lift planeward and beyond.
Orion beckons; the Pleiades draw one into their ever-complicating mystery.
Around one, the cold universe draws its breath.

Archeology of Feeling

A thought once spoken is a lie.

Tyutchev, Silentium

Language occults them so very thoroughly, (these secret thoughts that drive us day by day yet cannot confess themselves in grammar) that you must merely guess at them, infer like the astronomer who senses a new planet from its slight pull of orbit on a star.
Music, perhaps, might get you closer to them, Schopenhauer's perfect intuition of will, a kind of innerliness exposed;
but music, timeful and prearticulate, intermits in vast silences with each rest.
Poems would entomb them. Yet even here only rarely, as through a fluke of nature, will you find quick-frozen, perfect sacrificed remains, ice-maidens of feeling on whose slender arms hairs still stand in the excitement of creation.
More likely you will see here merely fossils hardened round the feelings they'd delineate, deathmasks whose chapfallen features you peruse searching for hints of the vanished life within, shards, fragments of a sensibility scattered in the ground. You must dig for all, brush, wash, assemble, re-imagine what was, in the instance, a twinge of envy, or groan of despair, delight, or gravitation of pure love, lazy satisfaction, horror of death.
And feeling their deep silence give them breath.

Intermission

Diffusely lit, the curved walls covered with red velvet spiral slowly down the stairs from the upper galleries. Turiddu, bumbling oaf, has had his Mafia-like demise. Soon Pagliaccio, make-up half on, will sing in anguish at the betrayal of his Nedda (namesake of my aunt's cat); the great, dramatic killings, and the final cry: La commedia è finita. But it is not over yet.

Crowds mingle as with one studied nonchalance. The usual cast of characters: two women, middle-aged, in necklaces, bracelets, their best dresses, chat about husbands, bosses, the dreariness of it all. Across the way a pair of sleek young men in dark shirts (they have known it all already) maneuver toward the door to the outside balcony, cigarettes ready in hand. A stately old woman orders champagne with an accent from somewhere or another. A young man in tweeds, no tie, a three-days' growth of beard (perhaps a music student), heads back in early. An older, Brooks Brothers white male, managing two cocktails, looks about as though he were enduring this for someone special.

Not much has changed in thirty years, except perhaps the cell phones that keep popping out unexpectedly and the earrings on a number of the younger men. I scan the room looking for someone who is not there, not queuing at the bar or water-fountain, not lingering under the two gaudy, great Chagalls, not sneaking a quick cigarette in the anonymous dark of the outside balcony. He would be sixteen or seventeen, a somewhat awkward boy masking his shyness in the seeming elegance of his blue, pin-striped suit (reserved for such occasions); dark-haired and with a stern, fixed look that might say: "I am the poet of this place if you only knew. Of course,

I would rather this were Wagner, as I yearn for serious things.
My life has little else to occupy it at this moment than dreams of poetry and music and great, vindicating, laureled fame that the future, surely, will bring to me.”

But it is no use. If he is here, he has become someone else, perhaps quite harmlessly middle-aged, keeping his secrets now, melding seamlessly with the rest, who pass this brief time waiting for the next act to begin.

Kinderszenen

It never rains when I think about those years; always sun, though cold, a sort of February daylight.
Usually I'll be reading, listening to Brahms or Schumann records. Always alone. But the picture window with its unchanging scene: blue sky, gray woods across the snowy road, is always bright.

As no one's there, often I'll settle at the piano, "dreaming with the pedal down." Suites and serenades, whole symphonies pour out with no audience but me.
Of course my play is clumsy and wrong-fingered, but the ear's a fine, self-serving editor, striking blundered notes, adding here a trill or there a thrilling run, muting the default fortissimo.

I took one lesson only. My aunt, the real pianist, sat with me as I tried the Minuet in G.
Beginner stuff, but nice, needing a real left hand and proper fingers, the happy gift of scales.
Softer there. Fourth finger for that. Legato.
Keep your fingers bent, your wrists parallel.
Practice one hand first and then the other.
For three whole days I worked at left-hand scales.
Perhaps with diligence, or Schumann's "seating pants"...
I thought of Rubinstein beginning at nineteen — perhaps it was not too late to do things right, another lesson in a week — but the week became forever.

The musician fled me, though his clubfooted symphonies continued quite some while, (I can still hear one solo played on a horn above soft, tremolo strings — when I write today, it's right here obbligato if you only heard...), but my best dream was already gone.
As one knows, without having to look out a window, that the light has changed, a storm is coming on,

I'd know to start dreaming something else, something for late starters, though it too require years of practice, years of dedication, something needing no teacher, though it aspire, silently, to the condition of music after all.

Midlife Mirrors

Drei-und-Zwanzig Jahre alt, und Nichts für Ewigkeit getan. Schiller

Perhaps it's just another bad hair day.
As I try to hold that thought, the mirror winces.
How did I ever get to be you? It can't be true.
That weary shabbiness about the eyes that once looked piercingly at the great world, the gray hairs insinuating near the temples — flags of surrender — this is not me, surely; this is not me, hardly more than a boy yet, just getting a handle on things, still arming for the battles yet to come...

I'll try some irony, an arch look about the brows, a disapproving scowl, — the surly fellow refuses to depart but scowls back. The irony's on me.
How did I ever get to be you? It's true.

I'll scabble up some precedents.
Elizabeth used thicker makeup and no mirrors.
The Marschallin stopped all her clocks. But it is vain.
Still comes the day the inner I must eye itself, the withered frame curls fetal to the wall.
No comfort there. Where are those snows of yesteryear?
Where's Villon? Rossetti? Hell, that was just meant for school.
But Life? An' I pluck this gray hair out, it hurts.

It hurts, and therefore I live. In the sobered eyes
I find something familiar, something I might own to (though they wince to see themselves), and even the five-o'clock-shadow face bears yet some semblance of the serious boy who still peers out at me from pictures. The lips of the young poet quivering to recite his love.

The slightly frowning brow that knows all this already.
Here is no surprise then.

Up and doing then.
Much is still unseen, undone. The windows need cleaning.
Outside the February wind awaits, a free, new tousel, another look, another chance.

Cleaning Up

For Charlotte Elena

Already putting childish things away — Too soon! my mind cries, though my eyes smile on you in their accustomed way.
Those are my memories too that you so blithly pack in cardboard boxes marked for the attic or the dump — hideous, pink ponies we rode together once; garish beads I saved I know not how oft from the clutches of the vacuum; girlish, crayoned Picassos; dolls you dress up one last time fastidious as an undertaker.
I have not changed so much (I cheer myself), but each year works sea-changes in you, bringing you taller, wiser, and more beautiful, and with that strange sensibleness of youth, you will not sadly look back but welcome the future where you want to be.

Sandbox, Soldiers

All month now, as green has struggled toward the sky, they have stood guard, stern soldiers clad in a fading Union blue. In balmy sun, in day-long showers they wait, as they have always done, their faces grim with expectation, their hands clenched round their weapons. Now some are fallen in the driving wind and lie with rifles shouldered. A horse lies near them in the sand.
All now incarnadined with blossoms from the redbud, they lie without a boy to general them around.
Unfazed by time, they wait for small fingers' grip again, for careless frowns that send them where, though old now, though stiff and scarred with many weathers, they want to go: to the cannonaded fields, to death grips, to the fray.
And all but unresentful that the boy in me has long deserted them.

Eight

For Jeffery David

Hurry up, it's late! Hurry up! It's late!
The morning sound repeats insistently amid the breakfast dishes' clatter, the revving of a car.
Yet shoelaces double-knot themselves with the lazy tempo of last night's dreams, which seem to hang on you still while second grade awaits. Hurry up, it's late.
So much seems slow in being eight.

Sometimes, through the glass doors of the porch,
I notice three of you sitting together, gazing reverently up (as in a church, except you are three boys and you are eight) at something which I cannot quite see.
The innocent, fresh faces of your "gang", free now to play video games without homework, without girls, trading the latest secrets of your craft with no thoughts yet of personal glory, debating the arcane rules earnest as parliamentarians. Or else I watch you swarm, beelike, the length and breadth of the sideyard soccer field, your voices mingling in a high choir of delight, heedless of the chill autumn air or of the coloring sun.
So much seems fast in being eight.

If I only blink, I see you three together still at sixteen perhaps, "almost grown", lanky and angular and with shadow beards. And when I try to listen in I miss the sweet, soft voices (quite like girls'), the little hands just large enough to hold or shake; all the earnest talk of Pokémon and Lego's been replaced now by math homework or sportscars, or the school dance about to start. Hurry up, it's late! Hurry up! It's late!

Sometimes I grope back through the dusty stores of my own memory, past twenty, past sixteen, even beyond being eight.

I am six

and quite uneager one night to fall asleep alone.
My father comes to talk with me, sitting by the narrow bed.
I am impatient being six. All good things in life begin at eight:
Cub Scouts and Little League and writing cursive script.
I want a uniform to wear to school and lead the pledge in;
I want a real, felt baseball cap with eight rows of stitches in the visor. I even want real homework, to be seen walking from school with inch-thick books gripped casually at my side. To do these things requires being eight, and I am six, and much seems slow in being six.
My father listens, smiles. He can remember being six, and eight. Six is a good age; eight is even better.
It will come, surely. I will dream real dreams about it.

So much seems rushed now, faster than the video days and nights you summon with a song in Zelda. Generations blur.
Last year you cried at the thought of leaving seven, but being eight is as good as ever it promised to be,
and having once begun is half-way done now. You want to hurry, with nine (horseback riding and the “major leagues”) on the horizon, but even though it’s late I’d have you linger just a little while. So much seems too fast in being eight.

Pinewood Derby

for Jeffery David, and Jeffery, and David

Cars should be built by the Cub Scouts with some adult guidance.

You know, it's really for the fathers after all,
a chance to show off one's tools, one's handiness at woodworking, one's skills in "shop". This thought's no help to me — two left hands when it comes to tools.
I measure twice, but need three cuts at least.
But I have a boy all eager and innocent of these finer points of fatherly humiliation: in the end, procrastination will not do.

Any technical assistance should be fully explained to the Cub Scout so that he can use that knowledge on future projects.

And so one night we mark our block of wood and try to cut it with a hacksaw (the only tool I have that's nearly suitable). The awkward bits
I clean up with a wood file I picked up somewhere.
It whirrs and sends the sawdust flying — voilà.

I try to babble on about the process, why this tool and not that, why not the one we have not got, or how, like Michelangelo's David, the simple block contains it's artifact already, which we only liberate.
(More filing there might do it!) I think he could handle the wheels himself, but they must be straight.

A car with untrue axles tends to steer to one side or the other

He wants to see it go and cannot understand why I keep taking the wheels on and off again, and do not let it fly across the room

(as Nature meant) to slam into a wall.
I think he might try, himself, the first coat of paint (we've chosen royal blue), but it's oil based and even if I had some turpentine at hand, I do not relish rubbing his fingers clean.
It's hard explaining that we have to wait now, that tomorrow I'd better do the finishing coat.
Perhaps, when I find a proper weight, file it, and weight it out, he might glue it into place.

Because it is difficult to establish how much help was given in building the car, some Packs have a separate Pinewood Derby Race for adults.

You see, I've been through this before. An old hand.
My father — artist, woodworker, basement full of tools — took me in hand to build a thing of beauty, an old Indy-car, perfectly rounded, aero, a sleek “ghost gray” with racing stripes in red, wheels straight, weighted (I see him soldering the lead).
My memory is that we won first prize that day, the “gray ghost” streaking effortlessly ahead of every other car, whizzing along the varnished floor of the school gym toward the finish. Cheers. A trophy.

This year we don't win, indeed don't even show.
The early heats disclose our fatal flaw:
my shiny weight (so cunningly disguised to seem a turbocharged exhaust) slows us the moment we're off the ramp on the finishing flat.
Over and over it happens, and toward the end he doesn't even watch, but plays with friends.
I sit, with a wait-till-next-year smile, front row.
As we drive home, he tries to cheer me up:
“It's still a good car, dad... And I can play with it now.”

The Last Spring of the Millennium

For Jeffery David

It begins with snow: great, wet, transforming flakes, winter's heavy hand to press and snap old branches that will never turn to boughs.
The hedges sag with a sudden bloom, the walls pile high, the early bulbs quite disappear from view.
Even by night we see the tiniest details:
the tracery of branches, pickets, pine needles.
By day, it is blinding in March's shadeless sun, soft as the air of the blue day first hits 60.
And as quickly gone. The spring has come.
The last spring of the millennium. Will it be in any particular, in any way different from the storied springs all poets celebrate? from troubadours, or Shakespeare?
Wordsworth's glad May or Eliot's cruel April?
Much is the same. Armies prepare spring offensives, brokers in lightweight suits still watch the Dow, scientists in sunless labs prepare the future, lovers haunt shopping malls to set their wedding registries, the networks ready for the TV sweeps.
This much is as it might be: life's rhythm continuing, preparing exams or vacations.
Why should we pause for any spring? and this one?
It's only millennial for us. Not Moslems, Jews.
And what of that Roman who got his dates all wrong?
For anyone who isn't dying now it hardly seems special, this millennial spring.
Why not let it pass with the thousand others, its blossoms break unnoticed like mid-ocean waves?
And yet to miss this is simply to miss all.
Not to sense the overwhelming green lightening wintered hearts, not to watch the spring, blossom by blossom, in millimeters creep will be a festering grief. And so with any season.

We go out while the snow still clings under the northern walls and pine boughs and feel a fine benignity of the warming air, the invitation to new life, the primal energy that has not grown weary with years.
You've known but eight springs of these thousand, yet you sense it. "Dad, I see an angel's blossom." I'm not sure what an angel's blossom is, but it must be good, all full of April and the spring, this feeling that propels us to outgrow ourselves as the blossom its bud and bole, to put on our best white, wingling as angels do, to live together the young season under the old sun.

Watching for Snow

for Charlotte Elena, Age 16, January 2, 1999

Was it just steam filling the radiator?
Or had the snow begun, millions of crystals pouring from heaven, dancing at the windowpanes?

No matter. We watched, for perhaps the dozenth time, our old tape of the Kirov Swan Lake, scratchily monaural, clumsily filmed with static camera shots, bewitching. And you were caught once more, your six years slave to Rothbart's trance, and I, a prince again, would rescue you, lifting you high in the air, turning you this way, then that, your arms aflutter as the desperate, last fight filled our small room. Over and over we played this.
The music swelled at us in dangerous appassionato, yet in my arms you were but featherlight and the vague, painted evil haunting the little screen would stand no chance against us.

Now you've awakened, swanlike, to sixteen years that watch you wear out pointe shoes on real stages where Princes and young Rothbarts alternate their parts, where ills and evils haunt backstage and audience-dark.
And you arch over them with practiced relevés, with arms extended, waving, and with determined gaze, and still I ache for you at every leap or turn.
I watch though I no longer lift you above the fray.

Are the predictions right? will it snow now after all?
or is it simply grim with wind and hail and rain?
We wait, uncertain yet, searching together the dark windowpane for signs: a distant glimmer in some outside light, a telltale tapping of the crystal dancing flakes, and as I watch you poise now, ready to leap into whatever scenes will come when the glass shall brighten with revealing day.

Aspiring to the Condition of Espresso

Although it's technically French roast, we like our coffee finely ground and strong, aspiring as it were, always to the condition of espresso, so strong in fact it frightens our visitors.
We'll make it at night and set the timer going,
so that we wake to the sound of steaming water, the smell of coffee wafting through the house.
You'll have your cups con latte, while mine are black, sweetened just so to drive the edge off bitterness.

It's always been this way, for me at least since I was a teen too young to know better.
Alone much of the time, I got somehow the habit of visiting my grandmother each day.
Mornings I'd set off as purposeful as if there really was someplace I had to be, walking the three blocks to her snug, brick house.
I can still see the kitchen, thick plaster walls bright with old fashioned, painted cabinets.
I can still smell Italian specialties already started cooking on the stove, steaming from odd-shaped, much-used pots or pans. Sometimes there would be peppers frying right on the fire, their bright colors blackening before my eyes.
Even now I smell them, an indelible deliciousness filling my memory as it once filled that room.

Back then I worked at pronouncing the funny names:
osso buco, strufoli, or something cacciatore.
Our talks were laced with Italian I'd sense and feel if not always understand. It was always something different: the Italy of her youth, her wondrous sense that the earth moved on her first train ride to Naples, her youthful sadness at the news of Rei Umberto's death, the woman from her village who pretended to read only to be caught holding her book upside-down: “Stupido, don’t you know all the best people read this way?”

I used to write translations of her proverbs:
“The habit does not make the monk,” of course; yet in the next breath “Clothes do make the baron.”
“The head that does not think becomes a squash.”
“Aspetti cavallo, wait horse, the grass will grow.”
Of course there were many stories of her father, the country doctor who fought with Garibaldi, sang in the church choir only to meet the woman he made his wife, who played the flute and wept when having lost a tooth to age he could no longer play;
the story of her first trip far from home, a visit to America that somehow never ended.
And there were her dreams, mystical premonishings of her father’s death, of her children being born; one where she called out to my father who walked right past her.

All this with a candor innocent of my youth.
We sat together at the old, formica table day after day, always sipping espresso.
I was too young, of course, for coffee at home, but she never blinked at getting out the funny old pot that looked like two pots stuck together, the little spoons and cups almost like dolls’ china, where even so the coffee was so dark we could not see the grains gathered at the bottom — like the future soon to happen and before which we quietly paused.

Central Park, Sunday

for Sara

This day will bear remembering, for its fair weather soul that somehow led our strolling lakewards here. For now, we pause unharried: nothing matters but the sun-gilded sails mastered by unseen hands of children. The city stands back awhile, the summer crowds blend round us in one great smile. Across the lake, checking his bike (an upturned hat some feet behind), the itinerant tenor stands at the verge and breaks into wind-buffed song.
At the Carroll monument a clown magnets small children to his busy trade. We sit and wait and wait as under some hypnosis of the wind-blown waves.
The great tall buildings that look over us seem now somehow benign, emptied of all business, their fearsome energy coiled, poised. They wait and wait, as loath to monday as we are to pick up our lives again.
For what? Surely, here, now, as each wave laps the shore as the singer washes down a song with Evian as the clown does up a balloon like a lion as we linger with another ice-cream cone surely for this one day there is no time.

Traveling from Virginia by Train

We all age together, this one day at least.
The grandmother traveling for her birthday party in a place once home, the students heading back after a semester's "grown-up" freedom, the young woman whose children trail after her like ducklings on the way to the dining car. And I, the weary one longing as well for a bed at home, the watchful one feeling my beard grow in the silent pauses.
The conductors, old hands at scenes like this,
read us all and smile and offer practiced chat as they near the end of their "run". As always, there are glitches and delays, but only the young fellow with a plane to catch seems anxious to banish the hours.
The rest let the day pass, moment by moment as we must,
in a sort of quiet benignity, keeping our public poses and our private thoughts, keeping a stillness as if oblivious of the rattling, vast machine that rushes us each to his destination.

Morning

I don't know what to think about, or do.
Not that the morning is not beautiful, lush with the twitterings of birds, the hum of small planes and cars. Other people know.
Other creatures. The birds and squirrels busy themselves.
They do not need to think when it's full summer and full green, and such a day is calling.
To get up on a Saturday and fly a plane, one must be full of hope.

The early sun has called me away from sleep, yet even two cups of coffee cannot rouse me to an un-nightmarish wakefulness, even on this morning when the vast blue universe settles so lightly on my hour.

But there is no turning back. Though we hardly sense it, time plunges forward. The quiet, postcard day turns at breakneck speed, and trying to hold stillness
I whirl with it in a helpless, thoughtless round.

Kampf

For Professor Edward Glas

Oh, how you'd have gloried in this foolish war!
 There you'd be again, up at the blackboard tracing the Ottoman and Habsburg roots, explaining in precise detail just why and how they hate each other, have done from Time immemorial, will always do.
 You predicted it, of course, way back when:
As soon as Tito goes, just watch... I know.
 I heard you. I still do. The voice returns now.

When we first learned you'd died (one dreary Sunday otherwise quite ordinary, drizzly, dull, spread with the New York Times) it seemed almost impossible. I could still picture you a hundred ways: the mock-fierce, Prussian eyes that would light up suddenly in ironic smiles, the "famous" stance at the lectern, a cigarette in one hand, coffee in the other. Habsburgs and Hohenzollerns crowding each other on the blackboard, more real than the fatuous importunings of provosts or deans.
 Dreikaiserbunds and Zollvereins, Moltke's
 "best poetry", Graf von Schlieffen's sleeve, and Bismarck's "damn stupid" Balkan quarrel (There are some problems that may be insoluble), Metternich, Napoleon, Andrassy, Wilhelm — so much life in that modulating, flickering tongue.
 I'm always there as well, the eager, admiring student whom you'd coaxed from painful isolation, transformed to the dignity of Einsamkeit (What the Germans mean when they talk of Einsamkeit is more than just our loneliness or solitude), mentored out of loony adolescence, guided surely toward the grown-up life of the mind, tough but sensible: Ha! Mr. Triggs, do you know why I'm arguing this point with you?

I want to teach you to be an intelligent conservative.
On learning that I'd switched from history to English:
So, you're going over now to the soft side.
That's OK, as long as you don't go too far.
Now, barely mezzo del cammin, so much gone with you.

All through that Sunday I struggled to keep hold of the voice, but it seemed the first to go, crumbling away with each soft touch of the imagination.
Realpolitik, that good psychologist, means putting such things safely out of mind.
There were, after all, other things to do.
I had my own life on the wing now as it were.
I had that Ph.D. to finish, which you knew would be for me a Kampf, a desperate struggle.
Over a shot of booze one night: you know, this is one of those things you'll have to tough your way through.
A long haul — and then you can write your poetry.
I toughed and hauled, and how easy it was to forget.
Just as my life, with such guidance, took its flight, you crashed, lonely, graceless, untenured, appalling:
court fights, asylum time, whiskey at eight in the morning to help tough through. Some problems are insoluble.
And where I could not help, I mostly winced away like the others with life still to get about.
terrified now to touch that glowing, searing, still-living thing, your solitary pain.
There were, after all, so many things to do.
Strange, I am older now than you ever were, venturing the uncharted future on my own, free to think thoughts of sober coloring, to make of the facts what I will, and at last,
in the glow of civilizing sense, quietly, simply, gratefully to remember you.

Magnolias 2000

Eager in the rich-proud service of the spring, they bloom early and without stint, holding back nothing, like some more cautious plants; indeed, they give so much of themselves that when April, as it sometimes does, plays a malicious trick (like this snow, no sooner here than gone), they cannot quite pull back and weather through.
The opened buds fill up in cones of snow.
Their delicate, pink skins, shocked by the cold, tremble with the unaccustomed, icy weight.
And then they droop and wither, suddenly brown, eyesores quite out of place among the other flowers that hasten onward now the hourly, inexorable work the season had begun.

Nature

The dog walking on his hind legs may seem, for a time, remarkable. It is not, after all, an everyday occurrence. It is full of amusement for the leisured classes. Often, they condescend to hail the dog with toasts to such abilities as even he grows shame-faced at the mention of.

But soon they all tire of the game. The great ones return to their affairs, while the poor beast, though he may venture a few more steps unattended, returns to a four-footedness somehow less natural than before, as though, from having striven beyond himself, he was now fallen more lowly.

Avoiding now even the casual looks of strangers, he cringes in a doggy way, and lets his tail drag downward and curl between his quivery legs.

But eventually his true nature reasserts itself: four good legs carry him swiftly and more surely than two, and blithely he courses where he wants to go.

The Wolf at the Door

a Dream

He is not at all like my dog Blizzard, the friendly Samoyed who watches out for my return, wagging his tail, ears back, glistening white in the welcoming, warm brightness of the kitchen.
The wolf at the door is scruffy, dirty, dark.
Only his teeth gleam white with a vicious grin as he eyes me and moves near, silent and menacing.
He's met me now. There is no place now to run.
Without thinking, I leap on him, wrestle him, pin him back with all my weight and strength, the strong jaws held firmly for the moment shut.
But the malignant grin remains, mocking me.
I cannot let go even for an instant now, though my arms ache and strength begins to wane.
One slip, and the razory canines will surely slash my arms, my wrists, the face brought down so close.
I wonder now if there is even time to wake.

Morning

O pflaumenleichte Zeit der dunkeln Fruhe!

Welch' neue Welt erwickelst Du in mir?

Mörike

The horizon forms itself first, a silhouette fringed with light. Then all the shapes hidden in darkness, as in gray mist, emerge, lighten almost imperceptibly, compelled with each passing moment. The birds know this.
They break into songs, first one, then others.

I keep to bed, though the pillows have taken shapes wrought by the nightlong twisting of my dreams that wither quickly now. Their terrors gone?
What new world indeed brightens behind the shades?

Christmas Morning

1999

I am sure that somewhere, even now, machines are whirring, jet planes landing or taking off, hard-drives spinning with their odd, muffled chortles.
But here the morning passes from silence through silence, so that, going out into the rinsed December sunlight, the only sound is wind itself, sweeping the frigid air, spreading plumes of chimney smoke.
Hard as you try to populate this silence, say, with a shivering tangle of bare branches, or the raucous descent of some few, spare crows, it insists upon itself. The sounds are strange — the flapping of wings, the odd “caw”, “caw” — eerily discrete, distinct, and quickly overwhelmed: like pauses in a kind of masterful, negative music where you may hear, if you can listen, modern echoes of the ancient miracle.

Marblehead—August 1984

You'll remember how we wandered that day (having somehow escaped the dead museums of Salem) the narrow, winding streets, walled or picketed, how we spied the weathered, shuttered "sailors' cottages" with their tiny closed gardens, often with keyhole gates and bright with hydrangias or rose of sharon.
It was easy to lift Charlotte then, and one could walk for hours not heading anywhere in particular.

And then to happen on the bay, bobbing with sails in the glistening sunlight. The blues of water and sky, the whites of cloud and sail, the blazoned boats and craggy, background shore—all seemed somehow painted for us with youthful impressionism. Glorious to be far away from home that day, we three carelessly alive, thinking neither of the past nor the future that waited for us in its dim coils.

Twenty Years to Life for Sara, May 17, 2000

Rain-rinsed, sunlit, a-twitter with every birdcall possible in May, the morning waits for us; in sweeping, sostenuto passages of breeze, the wind-chimes, two of them now, ring out for us.

Twenty years have brought us to this day, to this garden greener than memory, to this huge oak tree, spreading, swaying in the breeze, in which, if I look deeply, I can still see the lovely, white-veiled face with tremulous eyes coming to meet me, I can still feel my own heart beat with anticipation, as if for a journey; and then, veil lifted, the softening smile, the calm determination for departure.

Twenty years have brought us to this day which passes slowly, solemnly almost, the light stepping carefully about the yard, drawing the seedling flowers of last weekend. Its ceremony refuses interruptions: the importuning cries of children, who burst awake now, ready to go like wind-up toys, the roaring of a vacuum cleaner, car doors clanging shut, the passing of some siren. The birds themselves are at work now, fetching twigs and straw for their nesting in our soffits. Shopping, laundry, mealtimes have their cycles too, and follow one another faster than the shadows that begin to lengthen and mottle the green lawn. But I can still make out the trusting green eyes, the gentle hand held steady to accept its ring.

Twenty years have brought us to this day which hums along now, like so many others.
The sun, traveled round, shines now from somewhere behind us; we look out, spectators of the shade, upon the honeysuckled breezes of the afternoon, you with your knitting, I through puffs of pipe smoke.
Dinner, sunset, upon us, gone. No need of words after all this time, when the well-honed gesture, glance, or private joke still carry years of meaning.
And perhaps, late in the warm fragrant dark, wind-chimes will still sound out on the deserted porch, a look or a familiar shape, unseen but sensed and still loved and the old thrill will come upon us both.

Part II

Detail of the Last Judgment

Deathmask of a Girl Drowned in Paris—1895

About the forehead only a slight grimace speaks of something human, something flawed.
The mouth large, open like a kiss.
The eyes tightly closed, as if she were a saint seeing God in the darkness.
The cheeks hard and smooth, like stone water has polished for an eternity.
Did someone really live in this face?

Edvard Munch—The Shriek 1910

Is there no one here to ask:
who is this who has lost his way among unlistening stars?

All the body is pure sound bursting from its edges echoing back merely upon itself.

He has released the undulant world like a womb.

This is the only shape such terror knows, all contortion of flesh, all noise—
helpless as a whisper against eternity.

Paul Delaroche—The Execution of Lady Jane Grey for Charlotte Elena

All are in place: the weeping servant girls who cannot bear to look, the ministering priest, the patient executioner with polished blade ready in hand, the venerable oak block contrasting strangely with the one-day straw.
And Lady Jane herself, blindfolded, terrified, her brief seeing in the complicated world already done, kneels with her best satin gown drawn to a murderous décolleté.

The artist has delighted in the clash of textures here:
satin and steel, velvet and burnished wood, straw and the poor girl's length of red-gold hair so soon to be incarnadined. Another bride to death.
Others pass blithely by this scene, but you, my little one,
bring to it your four year old passionate stare, an innocence, like hers, confronting death (which even wise ones can't explain) as by necessity, and a regard of love to span the blank centuries hanging suspended where the servants dare not look.

Death on the Battlefield: Photograph from the Spanish Civil War

Beneath his feet, teeming the earth swoops; above him the sky is as blue, perhaps, as this one today powdered by a cloud or smoke. What matter?
Our attention, of course, is riveted in black and white upon the pure agony held motionless: his body's helpless loss of grace, his contorted features, the bit of his head being blown off—constantly, for all these years.
We wonder if for for a brief moment before he saw the anonymous killer;
or was he taken, suddenly, from humbler thoughts: the pleasantness of the morning, a glass of wine to be drunk that night, an evening with his wife?
What matter? He relinquishes all that along with his last seeing, his last hearing, the taste in his mouth, the eternal heaviness of his weapon.
His cause is now the earth.

Attic Stele on a Child's Tomb

Now that earth has recovered from the wound inflicted by her grave, she will appease the day's blue yearnings with a journey, her casual eye pausing in the usual, the well-worn places, casting about for the flesh of memory.
Out of Chthonic depths she brings a smile through centuries of youth, through all the deep imaginings of spring, into the warmth of stone. There she rests, waiting in her smile like a kiss.

The Lacemaker Ca 1666

The light as usual enters from her left
To fill the almost empty room;
Her hands, practiced, meticulous, and deft, Attend the rich laces on her loom.

In detailed miniature she pours her fine Devotion, soul, and female heart.
Her eyes, like Milton's, someday may go blind
From the long peering of her art.

John Brett—The Stonebreaker—1857-58

He is younger even than his morning spread with such soft, early light, purpled with miles of distance, wild-flowered and blue-skyed.

He wonders, bending with his mallet, are there times when there aren't any hours, times made of Sunday afternoons, times made of meadows and wild-flowers?

But today the great rocks have yet to grow little (as they must), and though the dog would play, he bends disconsolately to his task, the consummation of his day.

Behind him, a robin perches on a tree-stump; before him, like bones haruspically tossed, the broken knuckles of the stones:
the future where his gaze is lost.

Hughes—April Love—1855-56

She is not one to be taken, some midsummer's night, under a hedge, but still, in her ivied bower strewn with a first fall of lilac-colored blossoms, she requires discretion. While she looks outward to the light, her lover kneels behind in shadow, as natural as the green, blossomed background of his furtive kiss.
A kiss of nature. And she yields to it uncertainly, her hand at first, and what sensations thrill her we may only guess, as whether she will flee next moment into the sunlight that strokes her cheek and hair and arm and the blue folds of her dress, or turn from us to his soft shadowy caress.

Gainsborough—Giovanna Baccelli—1782

Gainsborough put her in that abstract land, Arcadia, and set her dancing to a shepherd's flute (his timbrel lies nearby), ribboned her dress with colors of the sky, and strew her path with roses.
But something in her blushing cheeks, and the smile, delicate and Italianate, on her lips and eyes, tells that she won't stay framed in Arcady for long.
She is no pale nymph, but a woman whose passion is for the world of days and weathers, of momentary musics, roses blowing and blown. For her mere mortal loves suffice, all preparations and regrets at which she smiles her sly, sweet, knowing smile.

Sargent—Carnation, Lily, Lily, Rose—1885-86

The elements of this painting mesh so well that there seems little to say, but to remark Dorothy and Polly lighting lanterns in their garden in Broadway, in summer, in twilight, innocent.
Surrounding them, to set off their innocence, lush grass and a full complement of flowers: “carnation, lily, lily, rose.”

Tall white rubrum lilies tower over the girls mid clusters of pink and deep red roses, and yellow carnations scatter palely at their feet. The lanterns even are like exotic flowers, gold and red, or unlit coolly blue. But pinning of color to thing is arbitrary and abstract. The momentary light is everything to our view. White is never white: the girls' dresses stream with ochre, green, pale blue, the light of the lanterns leaps to their hands and faces redish gold, an echo of the lilies' dangling stamens.
Even the grass shows a range of hue that hardly can be named with green. The colors merge here in the harmony of one moment all their own, remaining when the flowers and girls have faded and are gone.

Horse Dying at his Cart—Andre Kertesz

In the distance, too far to be made out clearly the dome of a church in soft gray silhouette, to which, doubtless, this road eventually will lead.
He will not know that time. Suddenly his work and aches and strength have flown from him.
He lies too helplessly at rest—no words nor whip will shake him from it.
Now the peasant and his wife must yank the bit from his teeth, and pull the harness off with a roughness that knows too well their common fate.
If he is still breathing, they will break his head in with a stone, and go on arm in arm bearing up the sky till bearing is no more.

Paris Boulevard by Daguerre—1839

Branches or boughs? There is no telling here.
A sudden wind, perhaps, kindling in the trees, consumed the season of this boulevard.
The crowd, impatient, intent as always on the moment, vanished with it.

Only the dark souls of the carriages on cobblestones emptied of their clamor, smokeless chimneys, stolid buildings their windows thrown open to the sun, and one shadowy figure in profile remain, mementoes of the invisible alive.

Young Lady Aged 21, Possibly Helena Snakenborg—1569

Over the dry centuries features reappear; we wonder and are terrified. Helena, aged twenty one when Shakespeare was but five, shows off her jeweled dress and ruff and feathered hat;
her red hair, curly and close cropped like a boy's, exposes the attached lobe of her ringless ear.
A narrow face, high cheekbones, tremulous lips and questioning, large, doe-like eyes give her a far away, almost a tentative look as she peers out of her childhood into the great world of marriage, courtliness, and death. Four centuries distant, tremulous too, her double in street clothes looks at her a moment, searching, like us all, the silenced secret of the past, and then shied by my presence, moves to another room.

Part III
Life Masks

L'envoi

“Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt weiss’ was ich leide” Goethe

My longing is a kind of Kantian splendor Mindly and shaping, but in sich abstract;
It wants an object, flesh and blood and tender
To imagined touch, and tingling of fact, Else all my courtesy is empty form.
Until I hold you I am left in desperate harm.

Aubade

First a shout, something like “Hey, Bill”, a title, an attention-getter that settles comfortably among my expectations.
Then the words that cannot be made out, not whispers or even anything supposed to be secret, but plain, boldly spoken things, rough even (from the voice), only they don’t quite find their way wakeningly, sensibly through the bedroom window at 7:00 A.M.
And now they are mysterious (they might as well be French, like that time in Paris), charged with all possible significance so that my ear strains after them, as after nuances in a line of Shakespeare, as after Revealed Truth (Who was it said truth is overheard?).
But the speaking tongues flicker and disappear, leaving behind, eager and inexplicable too, the tweetings of the birds and rush of commuter cars and me, awakened to my usual dark.

Hamlet knew it, when Shakespeare

sent him early to his death, for practice; and two millennia before them, Socrates as wise as anyone, I suppose, knew it maintaining philosophers should spend their lives rehearsing one breathless moment's movement toward the unknown; and you know it: sometime, anytime, toothbrush in hand, or fork, or at the office when the vault of some filecabinet yawns more ominously than usual, or later in bed with your lover, perhaps, practicing at life, you hear a click, or your ear buzzes you dizzy on a summer's day, or against the cool, fresh pillow you make out a muted thumping, and behind it, beyond it, around it, nothing, for the rest is silence.

Marvelous to drink the riddle of October

the first spell of the cold, the first brightness under which death lurks; with the universe still packed full to venture upon the wind, to move easily among the small things:
fears and blue skies and preparations;
to breathe only the best dreams.
As a bird his song
I carry my love always at my lips.

First Cup of Coffee, a daydream for S

If the morning coffee is black enough, so that the kitchen light swims on its surface, swaying gently, romantic as any moon on mysterious lake, then anything is possible. One stares into the cup, glazy eyed as a mystic or gypsy with a crystal ball, and the whole world is there.
And one can dream others, counter-worlds beyond anything in Baudelaire, places where people age in reverse, where the laws of physics are completely haywire, places without work, so long as this one's safely floating there.
And best of all if, draining toward the bottom it disclose its grains in dark haruspic shapes, a bell, perhaps, to twist one's ears, or lamb (or black sheep rather), or maybe just a letter, lazily serifed, completely familiar from being seen pretty much everywhere, yet changed completely now by membership in a dear one's name.

Antiques

Careful not to spill,
we perch in not quite comfort sipping tea (chairs, courtesy of one Louis or another) and I wonder, beneath the chat of you and me, at the centuries old wood supporting us, its weathers other than our own, its blooms, and the lovers who embraced beneath it of a May, and are now gone.

A Small Secular Song

From half-shut eyelids flows a sleepy light; the abstract, tousled hair (a stitch of troth) the bare arms trembling, bordering on delight: here is no inspiration in us both that's unrehearsed, no sudden genius flashes unforeshadowed in an ancient grace—a moment's fluttering of primordial lashes reechoes time and time and place and place.

But somehow it's new-minted, and has shown our passion marvelously new, what's ours to here-and-now, our momentary own untold in the countless others' countless stars.

And so we lie back easy, kiss, accept the past we form, the future of us made;
we are the world and what in it is kept—in being fated we're creating fate.

Lear's Wife

It was good luck for you to die before our memory began, fortune that you should witness three young girls, sugar and spice, etc.
and nothing more. You were spared all the bad sex and the gore, neglect of old age, the whole tragedy of wrinkles.
Gnothi sauton? Perhaps, you knew yourself as slenderly as he, but what did it matter? You slipped namelessly away, you were not hurt by mirrors, and had no tragic part to play; except, perhaps, as he would remember you wild and slender in his arms, more fair than the fairest daughter, giving him love as due, your dark hair tousled, your sleepy smile floating up to him, the white map of your body a world kingdom.

Young Woman Combing Her Hair

It is so long; trimmed with sunlight it covers and obscures the Botticelli face and velvet eyes.
Long, sensual strokes she gives it so that the soft gleam trembles there, and then, with one sweep, she flings it back.
Now all her body flames and a smile dances in her eyes.

In my distress
in my days made of tears and winter in my raging solitudes which hurl me in despair on empty beds or evenings I will remember this blithe moment and scatter the flocks of clouds.

The cat in the window is very lazy of the sunlight

of the breeze in the tall, shaggy locust trees of the birdcalls too distant to be of use of the hour of noon which can bewitch us all.
The cat in the window green-eyed against the green of summer concerns himself only on occasion with an insect or a butterfly passing by.
The cat in the window, sure, will never notice us or mind or tell how we have spent our noontime well and happy and almost alone.

Like a fig, or maybe like the universe

I open you, and this is the emblem of my love like a rose, or a ring. Older than youth your body beckons, and through a moment from eternity to eternity I pass.
Your hair is a jungle hot with endless August, your breasts fresher and smoother than sand-dunes in the morning, teased by a Sophoclean sea; for there is something ageless to you, like the sea, some prism in you of this human life counting its minutes in ashes, and yielding its moments to eternity. Like a fig you define for me this moment, like that one when we watched a dove sing through the air on a day in spring too fragile to remember except in you, when we clung together under the universe in our passing.

For Sara

With our house
its soft lamplight and seventy or so degrees around you, a cloak banishing the chill of the March night, you are sleeping—as beautiful as I remember, the image of peace. And yet I know well the troubled places of your dreams where you must travel now without me where I cannot help, though I kiss your cheek or press your hand. Or if I am with you there I am without my will and strength to protect you from the chill, the darkness within.
Sleep reminds us that there is no growing one.
Yet for these years, like paired trees sharing the same weathers, the same shade and sun and breeze, we have grown at a like angle from the earth, rooted together when we least think it, bearing each other's shape greening and coloring the same. Though distinct though dying, my life is never without your touch, like that first kiss you made me wring from you longed for and sweet in the having.

Apples—for Sara

In late May the season stretches to its solstice.
We awake to open windows, curtains billowing, the morning madrigals of the birds. We awake in a fresh intensity of green: full leaves, the lush velvet of the grass. The blossoms of last month are blown and gone, and in their place the green beginnings of the season's fruit:
apples, cherries, pears, all hued alike, all filled with the enormous energy of their different promises. In late May, in morning, one can almost see the colors of October, the reds of the apples, the yellows of the pears, one can almost hear the rustling resistance of the branches as the fruit is picked, ripe and chilled in the equinoctial breeze.

Grunts

Thoughts were always easier, able to wear the words we gave them like models or tailor's dummies.
Ideas, well dressed, are always quite presentable, whether in the black-tie of the conference paper, or in classroom tweeds, or even, dressed down and casual, for a bit of cocktail-in-hand smalltalk (with ice-cubes jiggling). Feelings are more difficult, though they like their liquor too. Sometimes it seems they don't want to be dressed at all, but to go quite nakedly silent, save for the jewels they always bear in 'meaningful gazes'; sometimes they grunt or stutter, primitive, cro-magnon things, fur-draped and hairy, smelling of blood and grease and musk, insistently gesticular. Yet these bear fire, and if one could only see, in their cavernous dark, cave paintings, miracles of articulate shape and line, sacrifice and conquest and the holy life.

Part IV
Commuting

Bird House at the Bronx Zoo—for the Zanders

Unlike the Snow Leopards, who must make do with outdoor weathers, New York extremities of heat and cold, our global greenhouse summers and this arctic February now, tropical birds live “completely as in the wild,” in tropic weather that, like paradise, will not change. In winter-coats, scarves, hoods, sweltering, we pause to watch them:
quetzals, toucans, birds of paradise, ibises, cockatoos in their green freedom, perched on moss-hung boughs or in the swing of flight arced and circumscribed by an invisible bound.
One might extend a gloved finger to them through what they think is glass, but it would seem the teasing sport of an Olympian, intrusive, otherworldly. Their territory is decided; they know from hard experience not to explore, to venture near the “air wall” and be stunned again. Therefore, they feed and rest, and we, who are without wings, pass by and through the great glass barriers between us and home.

Tigers of the Moscow Circus

Worth $700,000 each,
they are put through their paces:
first into the netted ring and onto platforms made of bicycle tubing, then standing on hind legs (something surely odd, even in dogs), now leap-frogging each other, lifting their winter bulk through hoops held in the bold trainer's hands aloft.
Their faces scowl now and then but on the whole remain implacable, even when the little man tickles their hindquarters with his whip.
Is it he who cows them? The audience, titillated in their gaudy chairs, all know that any one beast, suddenly grown cross, might swat and kill the man. Seventeen strong, they could devour him in their pride, and yet with circumjacent strength they cower and fawn for him and leap through fire.

The Peacock

Viewed from the highway, always in passing, it retained a certain stateliness: a Gothic house with gingerbread, white-washed and gleaming in the summer sunlight. Of the grounds we saw little beyond a swish of verdure:
that the plantings were various and mature, extending like a blanket up the hill.
It was, quite simply put, like many others, Victorian survivors in a plywood age fixed there so long as to be unnoticeable.
Only a chance business brought us closer one late June day, up the gravel drive and to the house. And what a shock was there:
the bushes were grown monstrous, wild, the lawns quite over-grown to hay, the driveway rutted, and the building blistering in the sun.
What had been gardens lay about, and yet so long unkept and wildernesses with weeds their forms were ghostly outlines only, a triage of flowers, a sinking geometry of ruins.
Yet from a corner of the house, suddenly, silently, a peacock stepped into view, inexplicable creature, his tail full-spread in its proud tracery of hues. The ruined aristocrat of this place, stately in decline, he held his garden court, as though history were nothing and one might hear, momentarily, the jiggling of tea settings and look and see the servants hurrying with their glistening burdens and lighting candles in the day.

Undertow—Bethany Beach, Delaware

To get beyond the rip-tiding breakers which scallop the length of beach with incessant clawings, one must negotiate the close-in waves with a certain care, sideways and in stages, eyes fixed on the sea, or at least reverting there lest one be caught mid-breaker, unawares, by any of the great waves, “honker” waves, and thrashed about by it like a rag toy worried by a dog. But once out, or rather neither out far nor in too deep, a calm possesses one. Even the big waves simply lift one gently, momentarily, and pass by spending their strength enormously in the foam. And here one may dream out sandwiched between the lucifacted blue of ocean and the still and limpid soul’s blue of the sky.
Wave after wave. Beachward, one’s life is strewn haphazardly on the sand, one’s wife and children wait at the foamy edge, sand-buckets in hand, the occasional seaward wave, the perfect picture.
Seaward, one sees only the humanless horizon marked with an aetherial strip of light, as if nothing were there, or the nothing where one might find all lost things, whole Europes sunken in the past, one’s dead waiting in the horizon’s smile, one’s youth.
Who cannot feel the urge, now, to let go of all,
to drift naked toward some new birth in the undertow?
After all, it would be tricky to go back now, awkward fighting the tow and being caught and thrashed ashore, all sandy and pebbly, to pick oneself up from one’s knees and begin it all again.

Home Run

Inside the boarded, chain-link fence, cries, importuning and important, sound.
Bodies scatter randomly like dice, then reassemble on familiar ground;

at the signal of the bat, they fling themselves again, another play is played, one more legged-out home run triumphing in the invisible annals of sixth grade.

Pausing, peering for a moment out of his importance, his affairs (quite like a sick child watching others play and shout), a home-bound businessman follows a third strike.

Perhaps he longs to join them in their play, turn in his flowered silk noose by Dior for grass-stained pinstripes: “hero for a day,” youthful and vigorous just one time more.

Strange, in those early days when even he never thought of mortgage rates, high yield, high blood pressure, when he could barely see over just such a fence, from such a field he’d look with envious longing if he spied some adult person speeding past, someone “responsible” in the “real world” outside, rid of the carelessness of being young.

“If only I had known,” he says, and sighs.
Now they are signaled in: like a balloon the game collapses, and regretful cries chase each other to the locker room.

He turns, topcoat in hand, to his pursuit of all those consolations age hath left: a Porsche, car-phone, and designer suit,
Black Label Scotch, and, optimally, sudden death.

Verzweiflung

It's quite the common thing, really, this business of being torn in two, unzipped from groin to neck, yet if one goes out in street clothes, suited up necktie and all, who would know? Who would suspect my two lungs, taking their orders from one nose, are not on speaking terms? That pancreas and liver, far from any intimacy the world perceives, take separate holidays?
Or that I eat for two? Outside this strange biology of despair, life, which has known so much that's strange it will not countenance the bit of strangeness that I have on loan, busies itself with blossoms and warm days, the serious business of the spring, of growth, brokers new marriages, mortgages new nests, old Aristophanean fallacies of youth.
It would not do to argue with all this,
or go wild, say, walking around with my shirt open to the waist, hysterical of my old despair, trying to disturb the universe.
Better to smile on all that with a reasonable smile, to go about, always, as though one were taking chocolate with Lancret, ever in a garden somewhere, in morning, under the old sun.

Inside my mind a mild-mannered madman quietly raves. In the voices of my youth arguing, cajoling, terrifying, he reminds me that life is not, as it seems some August mornings (with accompaniment of birds), like a Jane Austen novel but horrible, with explosions and meaninglessness and sudden death; that my heart will attack me, that my blood cells will declare revolution, that my tongue will give up words altogether and come lolling out, black and drooling.

And yet the sleek August mornings continue happening around me, with their songbirds and sunlight and cooling breezes right out of literature, and I walk daily, calmly in the quiet neighborhoods of this fiction and the madman must be mannerly as we salute the neighbors.

Birdsong I

Surely, it's cacophony, not song.
It accepts rules neither of harmony nor counterpoint; its melodies leap haphazardly, its rhythms are at once repetitive and weird.
Only as fanciful metaphor, the product of some bored shepherd, some lonely Greek, can we call it music: no more music than the spheres.
And scientists tell us, of course, that even its motives are not aesthetic: we tune our ears to hunger cries, war cries, mating cries;
and Philomela is a boastful, lusting male.

But something deep in us still makes it pleasant to wake up in the earliest dawn and hear the first bird "cast his soul upon the gloom," his fellows join with him in "madrigals" like clashing swords, "melodies" more primitive than Stravinsky, bird wars, sex, brute beauty to celebrate our fathering sun.

Nesting

Each year our drain pipe with its comfortable crook provides a nesting place for various birds: robins, or cardinals; this year it's home to blue jays, "townies," not transients; they've been here winter long raucous, colorful, mindful of their future.
We watch them as they go about their careful surreptitious ways, flying a circular route with beakfuls of twigs and leaves and grass. We dare not stay too close, for they are wary of their neighbors, but from the decent distance of the porch we spy the miracle instinct of their goings on.
This year, along with twigs and grass, they use a new material: the perforated edges of computer paper taken somehow from the trash, leftovers of our technology joined to their ancient art.
Nature lets nothing go to waste; and thus the edges of my poem about last year's spring (already fledged) find use in this one warming and weathering an unknown summer's flight.

At the Sea Shore—for my father

Today the blinding blues of the sky and sea the insistent crashing of the waves the cries of delighted children are painful, overwhelming, as from another world sunken in the bright haze of the horizon where I once belonged to innocence.
Now your arms will never hold me again, lift me from the threatening waves skyward toward a friendly and forgotten sun.
Now your absence is everywhere filling the sea, filling the horizon where I cannot follow though my longings have the wings and grace of gulls, the chained ambition of the waves in swell.

Portrait of the Author as a Child—for my father

Twenty one years ago
your love, your innocent reverie your best hopes for me filled the canvas:
the serious boy, his pages of imagined music the bust of the great composer presiding, deaf.
Even now they are intent, they continue their fever of creation: soundless, motionless.
They do not so much as glance at me sitting careworn beneath, my desk piled high with scattered possibilities. Somewhere in me still beats the heart of the boy with his ambition for the sky though I no longer feel it. You felt it and set it down for this uncertain, distant day: your gift, your Heilgedankgesang—music (I once told you) one could die happy with. You did not need it.

Commuting to Montclair

To live without writing poetry is to have the disturbing sensation of water pouring through one's fingers in despite of one's thirst, to see the images of a spring day blurring along at the mercy of windshield wipers, when what one craves is even momentary stillness, kept firm and particular.
To live without writing poetry does not confer a sense of freedom, as when one closes up a diary to begin living and not copying down one's life. No. For poetry does not copy anything (weeping cherry blossoms, for instance, shyly emerging in the rain), but offers for one's delight rival spontaneities of rain and blossom in the pastel of imagination, pure, enduring, blissful as a boy who passes on his way from school, and thoughtless of all the energy around him, moves through the lawn with meaningful steps home.

Part V
Found Music

L'envoi

I think that I will never see
A baby beautiful as thee—
My summer boy! my winter girl!
My only art, my heart, my soul!

Dandelions

The French eat them, while the English—so one gathers—weed them meticulously from their half-inch lawns. In Madison, where I live anyway, they flower forth:
dandelions, golden lads and girls, great constellations of them in their narrow space of green. While cultivated blossoms, blue-blooded lilacs or proud peonies, make slow, diurnal progress toward their prime,
these whizz unsponsored through whole generations, extended families, golden, gray, and blown, redoubling the vast energy of spring.
Yet make May languid under dappled skies, seventy or so degrees, soft breezes, perfumed air, and make me satisfied simply to be here now, to drowse or watch the lazy snowfall of the toothless lion.

A Snail in Abersoch

for Charlotte Elena

As if evolving, curling, unfurling through eons to its present shape, the snail's shell balances in perfection on a blade of grass. When we look closer, the snail itself emerges from the bell-end like the mute of a french horn, only living, a strange, wet muscle flexing itself along millimeters at a time, and oblivious in its primeval way to the vast, swift, momentary things (all wonder now) who pause to watch it move.

Lines for Gregory

Boy and baseball, butterfly and blue sky contrive together to knit their summer day, laughter racing over the sloping lawn, baseball looping into the blue, row on row, hour upon hour. Somewhere in the distance a flute is being played. Its soft notes weave, ghostly, a melody among the trees.
Overhead, planes are being tossed somewhere important—places like Chicago and L.A. again and again. No one watches; or perhaps only some adult waiting to tell us we can't play, curious, as when we watch the butterfly bright orange with purple specks, beautiful and helpless, buffeted by whatever wind is near.

Three Old Women

In the happy middle of their day they smile at my passing car then waddle like ungainly short-winged birds about their way; undaunted mothers grown into grandmothers idling in the day like children.

Rose of Sharon

Weedlike and hardy,
you bloom in the long summer's heat when all the spring flowers have quite burned away.
When everything else is busied with ripening, with roseate petals and luxurious yellow stamens you dare the role of the aesthete.

And yet how easily we disregard you.
You made no one's heart flutter with the first breezes of spring, and you are not,
hothouse and difficult, the pride of someone's labors.
Rather, it is your easy way with nature that disarms us, and it is only when in last blooms your strength is spent that we see in you the full wistfulness of September and our season's passing.

For Charlotte Elena, Three Weeks and One Day

Out of a restless dream I wake and Charlotte, with your three weeks worth of woe you lie there scratching against silence, writhing as in an agony of darkness.
And yet what agony can you know?
What dark experience can pierce your sleep?
I sing: Charlotte the world is full of lights...
Outside the night is quiet, save those sounds which tell me, in a speech beyond your years of the coming day: the first train in the morning and (muffled in snow) the sounds of commuters' cars.
Sometimes their headlights climb up through our windows casting ominous shapes upon the walls.
I sing: Charlotte the world is full of bells...
In our close room there are no sounds but the occasional rattle of the radiators or relentless ticking from a mantel clock.
Charlotte the world is full of hours. And yet you lie, it seems, in a primordial pain broken out of sleep, as to another birth.
Can it be that waking, which so comforts us even in darkness, reminds you disturbingly of that painful hour? Or do you carry troubles from some Platonic "other life" about with you? As it were, trailing such clouds of glory, we walk about the room dancers to a lullaby, and while your cradle teeters on the brink, heedless, you sleep again, and I am left troubled and awake to that loud world so full lights and bells and hours.

Scene from Swan Lake—for Charlotte Elena

Like a parade marshal, the prince waits at their head (two pliant, graceful rows of swans), and peers not at their number where his choice must fall, but at the watchful darkness where the audience sits and his fate, after the climactic scene, will be played out. Meanwhile the swans all poise bewitched in unison: their heads, arms, feet are matched; even their tutus make a white wild uniformity. Out of these, how shall he pick Odette, his destined one, to pirouette from her oblivion? And yet she'll move suddenly free, the chosen one, asserting her ineffable difference, a wistfulness, a longing, love, the fulfillment that for an act or two it brings. She and the prince (who stock character though he is is still too few) will dance the old dance all the others only hope for, keeping the white discipline of the background.

To Charlotte Elena, Dancing

Out of its dim and recreated past, music swells from the stereo in the room (through which the sunlight streams in counterpoint), moving you to dance, stirring some ancient impulse in your young body, rhythms you remember, as if learned.
In four year old toes the elevation of Odette, in four year old eyes the ritual sadness of play at love and loss and death, things you will need when the womb of this room opens to the weather and the world, the great stage where you must dance solo till the curtain time. And we applaud, who love you, this apprenticeship to tragedy, accompanied by Tchaikovsky's saddest mitigating strains, the difficult freedom you're so eager for.

Rilke's Carousel, Jardin du Luxembourg

for Charlotte Elena

It circles still, and still without a goal here at the world's great center. Blind and breathless, deathless childhood keeps still its hour of bliss, only now you are here, and though the elephant is gray, your smile is dazzling with five freshly painted years.
Bagette in hand, a sword, you lunge at the silver ring held almost out of reach—children toss Eden with both hands at glittering goals like these. Outside I watch (with Rilke at my back) the generations of innocence go round, for bliss at any time, in any language, sounds alike. And you will keep these moments stirring long after Rilke's faded from my brain, more purely remembering the poem we only try to write.

Children's Voices, Jardin du Luxembourg

for Charlotte Elena

Children's voices, when they wear our words, haunt at us with a mystery, like birds', for though an adjective is not on straight and though some noun trails its preposterous weight along the ground, these have strange power to beguile, like Eve's first questionings, their little while.
For Eden's laughter is still audible here; only one language is spoken. Thus, you share easily the French girl's dizzying play on swing-sets and sliding boards one summer day; in common wonder with a small German boy you needn't translate Spielzeug into toy.
Between yourselves one language makes for ease.
And only when it's time again to please parents or Eltern, the usual Babel tells how Eden sinks away in mystical low decibels.

Cleanup

By nightfall the parlor floor appears a veritable triage of toys. Barbie lies twisted and naked by the couch, her perfect hair embarrassed in blonde tangles, while Ken, mangled, one leg completely torn away, looks on quite helpless.
A war casualty? perhaps, or simply victim of a Tonka truck amok.
The beach-hut too is shambled, as by a hurricane, beams busted, thatched roof blown and scattered; champagne glasses, tipped and overturned, crunch relentlessly underfoot.
Were one to squint and not think so adult, that mess of crayon rendering the rug incarnadine might even pass for blood.
But we have seen it all before, and oh, sweet Reason bends our thoughts from horrors lurking at each turn to dustpans, washcloths, and 99 percent pure soap, the cleanliness—this children cannot know—that passes for understanding here below.

For Charlotte Elena

How they puzzle us, the looks in children's eyes, the glances already formed for life, the sapience of fairy tales waiting for words.

You, little Snow White, how I imagine you in all the attitudes of the breeding years, the adult mask, the child's mind struggling to connect.

This is the look to fascinate (though you don't know it) some little boy still charmed with soldiers and electric trains.

This is the look to wonder with on nights miraculous with stars, on mornings rinsed with sunlight, the strange benignity of living.

These are the eyes to question death, to learn that all we love slips from us by and by, that the eyes give up their prisoners at last.

And these are eyes to puzzle on with (though they yearn toward sleep) to live another day mastering what bewilders you while the future waits.

For Sara

The wind chime, our Æolian Lute, sounds out those breezes that reanimate at last the stagnant summer days.
Now everything seems a bell. Mimosa leaves and rose of sharon sway, tolling themselves in the wistful beauty of an August afternoon, while white soft cumuli blow harmlessly away and lazily the blue air descends.
We will remember well this lulling time when brisker winds of stern November blow the last remnants of the harvest high in whirlpools, and when lashing rains open our casements to the cold; and still the chime will sound in full tones of its first summer breeze.
So even our love remembers now the fateful fluxing of a distant April day, the tone of two souls blown somehow together.
And thus our primitive recollections stir through various seasons with a single, an obsessive purity, struck by invisible and animating force, and vibrating in our beings.

Bellcore Geese for Sara

Geduld ist alles.

Rilke

Weather by weather in the early spring which changes constantly its rules, somehow they know it and obey one changeless rule.
They seem absurd at times, sitting their nests beside the parking lot, ganders on guard, while we, the seasonless at work, trundle by them in our overcoats, or lolligag extra minutes of our lunch-hour in the sun.
The gander grouches, beaks at us walking too near, irritable creature, comic, as his mate remains serene with preparation: patience is everything for her. She often sleeps, or seems to, as the biding utterly possesses her.
Soon we forget to notice or expect.
Our days repeat themselves and pass to weeks; like waves, our deadlines break, only to recede again as unimportant memories.
And one day, perhaps by chance or out of habit, one glances over at the nest, mottled with woodchips and feathers, to find it expertly empty beside a violenced shell, half crushed, half delicately poised, a teacup filling with rain.

A Room for Charlotte Katcher

Evenings it catches California light, last light, second-story light filtered with green-gold oak leaves—banners in the dusk—the stuff that dreams are made on.

Autumns it gives upon two carpets of red leaves, dogwood and maple, gathering down softly, slowly to the November ground that hardens with dreams of winter.

New Years it witnesses great drifts of snow that build the porch roof in mysterious shapes, fais do-do-ing flakes whipping to windy music against the frosted panes.

Always it imagines—perfect fiction yet—its wide-eyed boy eager with fresh dreams of sea-discovery or love that make this room an everywhere.

So we would have it be. Brushes in hand, we instruct the walls to fable sand and sky and sea all round, so that anywhere one may begin a voyage, target some new horizon (ever blue and bountiful); or simply rest at seaside while lapping waves deliver their calm tides, hour upon hour.

So it stands waiting for its boy, for Jeffery, for the waiting he will do here, sun upon sun, to blossom in slow ages of life's welcome.

For Jeffery David

I imagine sometimes your waking, not so much into life itself, but into sense, the moments of dis-coalescence when the birth-world blurr separates into shapes to the eye's horizon, when the cacophany, with you from the womb, articulates suddenly into sounds. Thus is the world "born over and over", the scenes unexpected, the moments sudden, unchosen, and waking terrifies with its brilliance.

For Jeffery David, Age Three Weeks and One Day

An afternoon baby, your poem happens at noon and unexpectedly. Around us no premonishings of early dawn, but Saturday shoppers, milling, fingering the racks of a department store, plucking out credit cards. Around us the swishings of changing-room curtains, wrappings, cash-registerings—life's full midday throttle.

You sleep through it all. Hushed, cocooned, we wait together in a private twilight.
And this too seems business as usual.
Unnoviced father now, I see in you shadings of others, your sister mainly, but parents, grandparents, the whole damned lot of us timesharing, editing your fontanelle.
Patiently you dream on all our masks, the torque of your heritage in seven ages.
Poor, belated thing. I sense your lightness in my arms, and seven years are nothing—sweet and heedless, Charlotte sleeps again a primal infancy you only follow.

But you remain continually surprising:
a look patterns you, inexplicably your own, a cry escapes that's somehow other than all others (though how I cannot tell), your robust Urvoice calling for a love strong as before and different as this day.

Your fingers, of an almost fetal delicacy, grasp one of mine, the awkward giant scarred and blunt with use. Yours are inutile, fresh funny things that wear their baggy skin like ill-fitting trousers. Tipped with razory nails (thumb still unopposing), they barely reach.

And still I feel their force, a born strength making but the first of many claims.
The fingers already—so small one squints to see them—are whorled with personality; the palms, with heavy Shar-Pei creases, even now are rich with fate.

Learning About Gravity—for Jeffery David

Flying to California is perhaps a funny way to learn about gravity, leaping the Grand Canyon as from sofa to chair, landing, not suddenly backwards or headfirst on the hard kitchen floor, but in the slow descent of outstretched wings.
Yet even at flying speed, Icarian height, this clings to you, and will never let you go.
So, as you have these ten months in earthly air, climbing a chair, standing, balancing, walking, at each of these you learn about earth's pull, that gravity is ever rude, emphatic, humiliating, strict in her arrest, that yours and all our efforts (high-flying though they be) only hold her at bay, that walking and flying defer our falls awhile, no more, as consciousness defers our sleep.
And yet the world we dream is weightless, wingling, free, and we are masters in it, our steps light and portentous, our gestures time-slaying.
So that even knowing better, we go on and dare the dangerous things, to wake and walk and want and love, and get up when we fall.

Ungeheure for my father

The old slides, yellowing in their boxes still come to life under the projector's light:
scenes of Madison forty years ago flash with a strange familiarity; scenes of ourselves, children again, splashing through summery hours in the pool; vacation scenes, beaches at Cape Cod or Maine, alike now, sepiated with age.
These were the images your practiced eye thought worth preserving, the expected ones, the scenes of bourgeois blisses. But I'm drawn now to the peripherals in them, cloudy corners that have secrets still to keep, the background images of houses long since changed or gone, the missing things (and you are one) only to be guessed at now. And bleaker and more interesting yet, among these holiday shots, emptinesses, woods or wintry skies at which, who can say why, you aimed. These speak a darkness in you even then I never guessed; ragged, formless, their sure locus is what's gathered by the corner of your eye.
But cameras are not made for emptiness, immensities we only sense around us, inchoate, terrifying with their vagueness.
A kind of sublime, they always seem clichéd when in a frame, or helpless, hopelessly missed.
You missed, of course, for what canned image this side of Giotto's innocence can hold soul's blue?
Yet early as children we knew it, at play in our careless months, May mornings, August noons, even Octobers when the sting of a football tackle would tease us to look out, to where? anywhere, or the horrifying nowhere that lurked behind everything familiar. Darkly look out, and then forget it all, join back the others. Smart silently. This is how I feel, turning now as the projector cools, perfectly imageless at last.

December

One wonders, as the weak December sun flees westward early, if these bare trees, these sap-shrunk, ruined choirs, black and Piranesi-tangled against the slate of sky, remember their seed-bursting spring.

Sure, but the planet's tilt, a prying ray of sun, a breeze blowing warm again, and redbud and maple will resap, rebloom;
even now the ancient code kernels in them, pure promise, full of a fruitful June.

But we are far from then, our season lived and harvested. If we still bear, somewhere deep in our sap, pure traces of April's pastel, May's overwhelming green, these will not clone themselves anew.

And so we quake in the December wind that withers in our sweaters and rattles in our panes, not knowing what spring will bring us to, but sensing change that roots us by the molecule.

And so we cling, two and three together, piteously in our passing, scrabbling life from the earth and the thin air, and in the dark cold of the year leap at April at all cost and through all fear.

For Charlotte Elena, Age 10, January 2, 1993

Und zehn Jahre sind nichts...

Rilke

Nothing? Perhaps, if the perspective's vast enough, and super-human. But in our lives ten years are years to be reckoned with—but five of these, and it's a different world; back up a dozen tens or so, and horse-drawn carriages rattle upon cobblestones, the ballet music that you love to dance to is vaporware in some composer's head, and even Rilke cannot count to ten; a mere one hundred and a "new" millenium: that armor we once saw gleams in the field and Carfax tower's down in stones.

So one more frost-cold morning has come round, bright like that other, and as blue as only January can make. You sleep in, rather like that other day, as I keep watch on dawn, marking it in the tracery of branches as one more thing that must be remembered. Ten years back (perhaps ten years are nothing after all) tiny fingers opened from nowhere to embrace the world; now they play Beethoven (ten by seventeen before). Ten years ago a voice cried out in dark to startle me awake; now it rehearses lines for Juliet (back ten times merely forty), dulcetly yearning.

And now you wake, and with a yawny smile begin ten more, happily, towards the millenium we've dreaded and beyond. By tens you inch into the history of your kind.

Found Music

Trying to hold on to joy, the ear scans eagerly for song, for birdish madrigals amidst the daily hummery of machines.

The day is white and wintery, and no calls answer my longing. No registry of song sweeps on the air in bursts and sudden falls, trillings or swoops. But there's a jet plane long in the heavens that has some business there, and automobiles sweep by in constant throng.

Day's blankest winter business-as-usual stare, my sorry anguished mezzo del cammin, (Is this the nothing that is or is not there?)

meet and converse and seek the genuine not on some mountaintop or by the sea—for who, there, can take any music in—but on some ordinary Monday of a day that's bleak, cold, March, and quite at home, a sick-day maybe, shaped round an empty tree.

Here I wait and let the music come out of the sky-glare, from the passing cars, not Brahms or birds or that celestial hum that passed once for the music of the spheres.

Just a suburban music, tuning, waiting ever to happen, imagining my ears.

Glory

My uncle starred at baseball for Cornell, fielding, coursing the sunlit diamond, who bends now with infirmity and age.
My father was no less an athlete, but one indifferent to baseball, sandlotting through his youth, who learned catching in utility and thus, backstopped games where no one would, ingloriously without uniform or cap or letter.
Little for a boy to choose from there, his dreams all Ford and Mantle and the major leagues, who fain would pitch, but would not have his dad coach, or hang out at practices to butter positions on the starting team. Glory will out, brief though they promise it to be.
And so in those days my uncle, who'd long since given up chasing flies for chasing bucks, commuted in his Jaguar to work or golf, greasing leads and contacts, making the pitch.
My dad, for whom life must have been no less a struggle, took up his catcher's mitt again.
I see him now, patient with my windup, kneel in the yard in the sweeping green of May making a pocket, offering up signs I'd shake off over and over, pulling in stray pitches so that they seemed sharp-breaking, wicked curves.
And what did it matter if in Little League, fatherless, I did not pitch? There, in that afternoon whose warmth mingled the smells of blooming lilacs and leather with linseed oil, whose sky, pale powdered blue, deep, magisterially benign, promised us nothing of this might change, what glory grew there in the backyard grass.

A Letter to Michael (1954—1962)

I.

It is now the summer of 1992, more than thirty years since we last talked. In many ways things haven't changed. Kids still pedal their bicycles around town and take in the Fourth of July fireworks or the carnival or a movie. Kids are still eager to get out of school but bored stiff on the long summer days that deliver them oh so slowly to adulthood. Childhood still seems endless. But having made it through school, we are, many of us, into our late thirties, our second jobs, our second kids, our second wives. We drive around in small cars now, built usually in Japan or Germany, and even our kids do their work on computers. We no longer hide under our desks to practice for the atomic bomb to come. Yes, some things are different. The Yankees no longer win the pennant every year. An ice cream bar costs over a dollar. Elvis is dead. Nixon is still alive. Meanwhile, many of us are beginning to go gray, and to develop obscure pains, and to get tired of everything, even sex (which I'll explain another time), and often we try to forget about all this and seek a sort of oblivion, like that guy, that drunken cop who ran you down on an otherwise perfectly normal evening, a day you began like any other, long ago.

II.

I don't remember all that much really. You'll have to forgive me for turning out forgetful like the rest. I remember when you first came to school, how I wrote an essay about the new boy who had made many new friends, "especially me". I still remember struggling with the spelling of that "especially". And how your mother let you ride all the way across town to play. I don't remember where I heard the news, or who told me. But I still see your empty desk at school and with a bit of effort feel my seven-year-old gloom, my shocked and battered incredulity (another difficult word). Nowadays, no doubt, a crew of "childhood trauma professionals" would descend on our class with briefcases full of therapies, but we made do with a few words from the teacher and a schoolyard of rumors and the overwhelming evidence of your unattended desk (hardly big enough for me to sit at now) that still held your “things”—rulers and pencils and erasers and brown-paper-covered books with words like “READING” in your childish hand. On the playground some days after, I made an ass of myself. I told another boy in halting, tremulous words, the sort that cast about hopelessly for confirmation, that if Jesus could return to life, perhaps you would as well, perhaps right after lunch or next day. I imagined you back at your desk again before it could be cleaned out and reassigned. When we got back, you were not there, and first thing he raised his hand to tell this to the teacher and the class. I remember I ran in horror from the room and not much else. Later the teacher put the nix on all such talk. I don’t remember her words. Second grade finished up anyhow. Your picture was in the newspaper and I cut it out and, believe it or not, kept it for years till it yellowed on my bedroom door and the image grew more strange and strange, as such images do, faded and distant and oddly young. It got misplaced somewhere, sometime, in the place where lost things go; I got distracted into the business of growing, of getting older, putting away childish things, acting like a man.

III.

As a man I try to talk with you now, but we have nothing any more in common. You are younger even than my daughter. If I were to see you now, come back pedaling your bike along the street, I would not know you, would not greet you or hang out with you. Probably I’d pass by like any strange adult, weighed down with my own affairs and other griefs. Yet at times to this day I make out something of you living over and over in the children I see wending through childhoods that I know can flash suddenly, as in the glare of headlights, into the vast uncertainty of all our lives.

“Real” Love—for Sara

Just as we're about to give up on it—almost—something stops us. It might be something subtle, like a familiar glimmer in your eye, or the curve of your hip slimming down your leg, or maybe just something in a movement of your sleep, a habit that refuses to depart, and the desire, suddenly, to caress you overwhelms me once more. Surely, I admit, this is no longer spring-feverish, a La Bohème longing that drives one silly, Romeo delight that sends one leaping with sheer novelty:
all expectation, all unknown, unrealized, the undebatable promise of a bud in May.
Fourteen years forbid it. With us no more a time when months, weeks, days, hours pine with one object, the chance of company, burn all the world and worldly things away, consume them as a flame the air, intent on consummation only. Tired our days, fraught with insistent day-to-dayness;
all jest aside, sublunary our nights, and love a blossom opened to all weathers, a working love, more fruit than blossom now.
Was it a lie? a snare of long-lost spring?
What were they for anyway, the concerts and late suppers, Schumann Sundays in our tree-hut rooms? We are now two births later, and sadnesses have grown round us, as they must,
like weeds in the full leaf of a summer.
Unlike the crew of easy Romeos and their girls, we survive into the world's vicissitudes.
Can love survive such unpoeticness?
Better, it learns to outgrow poetry

(which knows only its beginnings), to seek richer satisfactions of middle and of end.
Day-to-day love makes room for squabbling children, angers, encroaching age, spring and spring-cleaning.
But the rose, weathered this far along, does not grow sick; the summer’s fruit, monotonously hued, colors ripe, for harvest and for tasting.